The pessimist says, 'the glass is half empty.' The optimist says, 'The glass is half full,' and the journalist says, 'You won't believe what's in the glass!'

Hi! I'm Georgiana, and I'm glad you're here with me for a new podcast episode.

Today, we will discuss the different types of journalism we can find in the media.

Before you start listening to the episode, make sure to get the transcript on my website: SpeakEnglishPodcast.com It's free!

Are you ready?

Let's start with the first one:

The news

News is a crucial and representative category of informative journalism. It covers recent and intriguing political, sports, cultural, and social events.

Objectivity is a vital but often lacking aspect of news. Ideally, a news story should be impartial and unbiased, but this isn't always true.

Brevity is another key aspect of news. A news story should be concise and include only essential data. It should only focus on giving information about the event.

A typical news story consists of several parts:

- Firstly, we have the headline. It has a larger font and expresses the main idea of the news story. It is a short sentence. For example, "Georgiana launches a new course." That would be a good headline.

- Moving on to the lead, it is a kind of summary where the fundamentals of the news story are discussed. It serves as a summary introducing the main aspects of the news story, answering essential questions like what, how, who, where, when, and why.
- Lastly, we have the body of the news story, where further details and information are provided beyond what's covered in the headline and lead.

Let's uncover another element of journalism:

The report

A report is a more detailed news story that provides various data, background information, and opinions from those involved.

Unlike news stories, reports can include the writer's opinion, making them somewhat subjective.

Traditionally, reporters often went to the story's scene and prepared reports that helped readers understand what was happening.

However, in today's technologically-driven world, this practice isn't always followed. Some reports are created from the newsroom, relying heavily on internet research. While it reduces costs, it can compromise the report's quality since journalists aren't physically present at the events.

I really like this expression: "You have to hit the streets." It emphasizes the importance of journalists leaving the newsroom, immersing themselves in events, conducting interviews, observing firsthand, and gathering relevant information.

Lastly, let's explore another aspect of journalism:

The interview

It's a simple yet powerful conversation between a journalist and an interviewee.

Journalists often edit interviews, removing less relevant parts. However, this can be controversial as it alters how readers or listeners perceive the interview.

An interview report is another type of interview that includes the questions and answers and details about the interviewee and their surroundings. It may also include relevant biographical information, providing a more complete and in-depth picture of the person.

What do you think? Now that you know all this, would you like to become a journalist? One thing is for sure: today, we have learned useful expressions and vocabulary you can use in conversations.

Let's continue with a point-of-view story.

Okay! Let's start!

Let's listen to the story in the past tense in the second person singular.

You always dreamed of being a great journalist. After graduating in journalism with honors, you got a job at a big media company.

At work, you used what you learned in college and wrote news stories that were fair and truthful.

However, your boss wanted you to make the news more sensational and follow a different approach.

Feeling like you weren't doing your job properly by following your boss's instructions, you decided to quit and started your own blog called "News Bites." There, you shared short and objective news stories.

Although you enjoyed your work, your blog only had a small audience: your mother and four friends.

Determined to keep reporting honestly, you covered silly and unusual news stories like the annual ugly dog contest or the sausage-throwing championship.

Your unique and entertaining approach became popular on social media, and your blog became the most-read in the world. This brought you fame and recognition as a journalist, even though you only reported on bizarre news.

As your reputation grew, you were eventually offered a job at a major news network. With your show, you continued covering strange and funny stories while addressing serious issues with your characteristic wit and honesty.

Okay, now I'll tell you the same story, in the future tense, in the first person.

I will always dream of being a great journalist. After graduating in journalism with honors, I will land a job at a big media company.

At work, I will use what I learned in college and write news stories that are fair and truthful. However, I will consider my options if my boss wants me to make the news more sensational and follow a different approach.

Feeling like I won't be doing my job properly by following my boss's instructions, I may quit and start my own blog called "News Bites." There, I will share short and objective news stories.
